

FUCK, SORRY is a performative act rewiring common gestures, addressing the relationship between technology and body as a communicative agent.

When international and interpersonal discourse seems increasingly dominated by inanity, offense and provocation, what becomes of the interpretive implication of the crude? In politically turbulent times, can the misappropriation and fallability of human communication effectively convey generative social unities?

When western communication - verbal and non verbal - is defined by heteronormative male desire, what possibilities do new technologies offer in interrogating that dominance?

FUCK, SORRY throws the anger of sexually informed gestures directly at the technologies. Perhaps, through implicit forms of pleasure within that interaction, new forms of change can be identified. Our enhanced sensorial movement take us to an inclusive territory that defies and short-circuits hate with laughter.

FUCK, SORRY enacts a potential: the power of the technological can propose non-exclusionary social continuums by neutralising the implicit power of gestural movements.

FUCK YOU 2

I do not believe that your opinion is correct, furthermore I'm desirous of your ill fortune.
